

I ask the FCC to reject the proposed expansion of Low Power FM broadcast service. The expansion of LPFM service and giving priority to local LPFM broadcasters threatens to displace regular FM broadcasters to whom I look for more national perspectives and for national broadcasts having a quality not easily matched by local broadcasters. Along with many others, I listen regularly to K-LOVE, a national broadcaster of Christian programming on FM radio. Such services, and K-LOVE in particular, serve the public interest by providing a quality of broadcast not easily matched by local broadcasters, especially from a religious perspective. Access to local programming on either AM or FM stations has not suffered, as I can still turn my dial to a variety of local broadcast offerings. However, I - and many others - would sorely miss the high-quality programming of K-LOVE if it were displaced for a local LPFM broadcast.
